

To the Steward of Family Wealth

Dear Steward,

You may never have founded the family business.

You may never have created the first fortune.

Yet history has entrusted you with something equally significant.

Its preservation.

Stewardship is rarely celebrated.

It attracts little attention.

Yet without it, every generation begins again.

You are not expected to predict every market movement.

You are expected to exercise judgment.

To balance opportunity with prudence.

To distinguish temporary excitement from enduring value.

To think not only about today's family...

But tomorrow's.

The question is not whether wealth will change hands.

It always does.

The question is whether wisdom travel with it!

Remember that true stewardship is measured not only by fortune you inherit...

But by the condition in which you pass it forward.

That is how legacies endure
